

Citation City

This new live a/v performance is inspired by
The Arcades Project by Walter Benjamin
Citation City collages, edits and recombines
300+ major feature films either filmed or set in London.
Creating a story within a story, of the film world, living it's life,
through extraordinary times of change...

Citation City is a time-travelling voyage through one city, assembled from hundreds of movie clips and inspired by the wanderings of Walter Benjamin.

A patchwork of over 300 features either filmed or set in London, Citation City combines multiple narratives to create the story of one city in a period of enormous change. Pieced together by audiovisual artist Vicki Bennett (aka People Like Us), this beguiling, labyrinthine work takes its cue from Benjamin's Arcades Project, which was an ambitious attempt to map out Paris in fragments, which was cut short by the author's death in 1940.

Citation City sources, collages and edits using 300 preexisting feature films where content is either filmed or set in London - to see what happens when these multiple narratives are combined... what will the story tell us that one story alone could never tell?

This pdf is intended as a companion to the audiovisual work, giving examples of the process one might undertake to create new work when sourcing from a large media database. This particular example relates to moving image and musical composition, but the methods can translate to other platforms that use composition, directing, editing, creative narratives and story telling.

Regardless of which medium we may work with, we have to find a way to gather our thoughts together onto one concentrated palette where they are all available to use. Whether writing, composing or editing, there comes a stage where memory may no longer serve us alone. This is the case with a lot of my large-scale collage a/v projects. Below here are some examples of how I process this information.

The first thing is to choose a subject or idea that you want to explore. In the case of Citation City it is finding threads within and relationship between feature films shot or set in London. At the beginning I needed to search for source material. At first, I relied on memory alone, and that of friends - this helped start the list. A Google search brought up articles and forums on film, which then lead to specialist movie sites. The wonderful thing about the internet is whatever the search, someone has already been looking before you, and the main job is to find the 5% of content out there that is thorough and well informed, AND to try and keep your mind intact in the process (this is the internet after all). I found two sites that exhaustively research and locate where scenes in movies are shot and some even show you what they look like now: reelstreets.com and movie-locations.com

Titles highlighted in red below, link to more information and all the stills and 'now' shots we have for the film. Titles in green are awaiting uploading. Titles in black (well, dark grey actually) are our "wants" list. Have you got a copy of any of them? Will you swap, sell or give it to us for our continued research into film locations?

If you are stuck for an idea, that's not a problem... ideas sometimes limit you to your old ways anyway. Being "process led", means you decide along the way in a sort of "collaboration" with what you find on your journey, it's rather like going for a walk. Instead of having an "idea" you think of exploring something that inspires you, and start finding more information about it on forums or a search engine, in an archive or library. Using a thesaurus is perfect for finding new relationships between subjects. This process led method can open you up to new ways of creating that are far more playful and experimental rather than worrying from the start that you won't have a masterpiece. Having an idea isn't something supernatural and spectacular, it's just the result of making interesting connections, and in turn you should not worry about originality since it is only through these connections that we get the idea in the first place.

The wonder of working with collage in any medium material is generally available to you, and that juxtaposition of material can spark new ideas, much the same way as a conversation can. When editing and collaging you are in a way "collaborating" with this selected material in the sense that it already contains it's own history and "life", and it then goes on to have multiple contexts once you combine material.

The next stage is to seek out source material to edit. For CC I spent 4 months viewing 100s of fictional feature-length movies, choosing what was interesting along the way, throwing to one side what was not. With movie files you can open them in QuickTime 7 and trim movie selections within, and crop and save just that snippet. Then you name them one by one, put them in a folder, and move on. I watched 3 movies a day and kept going until I felt that my Google/forum results had brought me a fairly large comprehensive list of the subject I was examining. Bear in mind that when dealing with a large subject you may find the list is endless, that the more you look the more you find - you might just stop when you think you have enough. At this stage, for each movie snippet I typed descriptions into a text document.

The more you look the more you see - an even bigger picture, one that is made of small stories, yet there are lots of stories that not only stand alone, but overlap with one another. These threads go way beyond the subject that you may have initially chosen (in this case London), and start to telling the story, even defining what an actual "story" may be. Compare Citation City's (above) to Walter Benjamin's list of convolutes in The Arcades Project (below) in relation to 19th Century Paris. There are remarkable similarities.

The problem with working with audio and moving image in the context of using preexisting material is it's already been put together! So you are dealing with something 100% made images and 100% made music/audio. It is already composed/edited so although it is indeed a palette, this palette is limited. It is not "stock footage". So as soon as you start trying to transform and juxtapose the material to make new relationships (and this IS what we are trying to do here!) you find that you are in collaboration with what already happened - working with something that to one extent already exists, and your job is to now make it into something extra too. However, this is what makes it interesting, that we are dealing with things already familiar to the audience, so there is the bonus of the journey that material has been on up to this stage. Plus we have magic on our side - it is amazing how these snippets of image and sound really do want to speak to one another. The actors really do want to meet on the screen together in the way they might not have in real life. The singers want to sing together. You will find that with collage you get amazing synchronicities of timing and key, and since we are already working with colliding narratives we just need to bring these things together on the video and audio software timelines.

How you go about it from this point can vary enormously. Editing is something that you can learn both in a class or online tutorial so I will leave you here. If you treat editing sound and moving image together hand in hand, step-by-step, you can eventually walk the journey. Do not cop out by making the film then finding some music to throw on top or vice versa. Be thoughtful about your soundtrack. Be transformative, try to be engaging, lend another perspective, and remember that this is as much about experimentation as outputting a final product. - - Vicki Bennett (February 2015)
